Will Extra Verification Make my Device Susceptible to Public Records Requests?

Issue:
I'm using my phone to authenticate for Extra Verification. Does this make it susceptible to public records requests?

Solution:
There is very little chance of this occurring. For full details, please see the response from the AG's Office below:

"Although the verification codes are technically public records, they likely would be considered transient and therefore could be deleted by the employee after use. If there was a records request for the codes, the employee would be asked to provide any codes that still existed on their phone. Under current case law, if the completeness of the employee's response to the request were challenged, the employee could be asked to provide an affidavit. Seizure of a phone is highly unlikely."
